In the watercolor picture, I used bears instead of people to emphasize colors. On the left side, I have a black bear and white polar bear wearing a rainbow scarf fighting each other. Rainbow stands for homosexuality, so not only are they arguing about sexuality but they are also fighting about race. In between the two is a tiny polar bear pointing to the bear couple on the right trying to get them to stop fighting. The bear couple is an example that "we can overcome our differences." For the baby and children bears, I chose pandas because they are black, white and Asian. There is a red panda sleeping and that could be the emphasis on tolerating others no matter how different they may seem.
